Participation During In-Class Discussions*:

Studying what others have written is not like doing arithmetic, a calculation done in private, deriving an answer which, if correct, will agree exactly with the answers of others. The study of literature is a conversation which has been carried on for centuries, and which should continue with each student as he or she reads: underlining, questioning, responding, imagining, thinking, feeling, "conversing" with the writer while the student writes notes, essays, or exams, or as he or she talks with others about the readings. The classroom is an important setting for this conversation to take place. Students often find that their interpretation is somewhat different from that arrived at in class; this is not wrong, but exactly what should happen. Each of us brings a unique experience, mind, and sensibility to what we read, so the class's interpretation(s)—the refined combination of many people's ideas and insights—should be larger and richer than any individual's. The achievement of such breadth, depth, and richness is one of the important values of class discussion, and one of the reasons participation in discussions is not simply something a student might elect to do, but rather it is a student's responsibility.

Learning is not passive, but active; we learn by doing: reading, thinking (analyzing, synthesizing, questioning), writing, and talking. The classroom should be a laboratory of ideas, a place in which both students and instructor test and deepen their insights by speaking them out loud, countering, qualifying, or extending the insights of others, that is, carrying on, in the classroom, the centuries-old conversation about literature and its ordering of human experience. Therefore, all students in this course are expected to participate in class discussion throughout the semester. Your participation will be noted, and eventually credited toward your grade. Obviously, to participate, you must attend class.
